A caring planet

Sometimes you can't get all the stories of all the people you treat as clients and their fates out of your head – all the injustices, the violence you have experienced, all the shortcomings you are confronted with.

In your mind's eye, you can see all the adults, youths, and children, the sick and the mourning, the angry and the helpless. When you go home, you never really feel like you've arrived there, because in your mind you are still with your clients – sitting next to them in the car, beside them on the sofa.

Imagine a planet, very far away. It is a small planet, a little bigger than the one the Little Prince lived on. And it's a special planet because it changes depending on who comes onto it. In what way? In exactly the way that suits the person in question. One person might like to be in a garden, or in the city district they live in, or on a beautiful island or just together with their loved ones.
You can let your imagination run free, but you can also be certain that the planet will take on the form that it needs to have for each person it is designed for, and you can also be absolutely certain that the planet will look exactly like it needs to. Without you having to do anything. Food and drink, space to relax and sleep, flowers and streams, music and the sound of the sea are some of the things that might be there. Everything the person you are concerned with needs – the person who you take home with you in your mind – will be there.

Once you have also decided which solar system your planet rotates in and how you would prefer to reach the planet (by being beamed there, or per shuttle or space probe ...?), then the person you (still) can't get out of your head, sit down with them in whatever transport means you have chosen with and fly with them to the planet. When you get there, the entrance portal might look a little different each time depending on who you have taken with you. After all, you are not the one who will be going through it – as it is the dream place of the other person.

Everything is good there and it lacks nothing. The person will be just fine there.
